

Your LinkedIn® Profile Should Tell A Story ... Your Story

J. H. Capron

LinkedIn can be a problematic tool to navigate and get the right sections and words. Add 660+ million members, and trying to highlight your specific skill and talents becomes even more challenging. If it were not for your assistance, I think I would have been flying blind. But you're an expert in the workings and metrics of LinkedIn. Through your trustworthy help and advice, I built a profile that stood out and helped me land my dream job. You enabled me to write a LinkedIn profile that attracted the right recruiters, used appropriate keywords, and represented me in the best light possible. Thank you!

Your Summary Bio

The Summary Bio summarizes your career. Don't make the mistake of leaving this blank. This is your opportunity to describe your career in your own words, setting the context for your profile. Make sure to weave in the keywords you feel are necessary.

About

I'm a retired operations professional, having built a 43 year career in manufacturing, planning, IT development, and consulting.

I have been a Technical Team Leader, Development Manager and ERP Senior Consultant for the IBM Corporation, an ERP Senior Consultant for Keane, NYNEX, Origin, and Philips. I have also held the following positions at Philips: Materials Manager, Systems Operations Planning Analyst, Production Control Supervisor, Manufacturing Supervisor, and Production Data Analyst. My real introduction to the world of manufacturing began with Georgia-Pacific and Kraft Foods. Along the way, I became quite proficient in production & inventory management, but also recognized that I needed to become highly capable in enabling methodologies & technologies as they became mainstream. I have a solid understanding of ERP, Project Management, Requirements Engineering, Business Process Design, Software Development, Mind Mapping, SEO, Web Design, S&OP, and Structured Analysis.

Looking back on my career, I've had a number of proud moments. Here are three: creating a worldwide SAP upgrade methodology for IBM that reduced its upgrade cost by 60%, and is now the basis for one of its business units; recovering a Midwest client's failed revenue management implementation that could have severely crippled the corporation; devising a remote process education model for training our IBM personnel in China.

So now in my retirement, I lecture and write on ERP, Process Analysis, Requirements Engineering, Production & Inventory Management, Project Management, and LinkedIn®. I'm also involved with the Association of Supply Chain Management (ASCM).

Sometimes The Most Important Requirement For A Project Is Courage: A Cautionary Tale Of Project Management

Oct 21, 2019 • Amazon Digital Services LLC/OnceAnArmyMedic Publishing

Amazon #1 New Release in IT Project Management.

In 2002, a major IBM Division performed a significant upgrade to their SAP system. It was a failure. In 2004, another IBM Division would move ahead with its project to execute the same upgrade. This story is about that project, and why it succeeded. It's a tale of discovery, good project management, and the professional courage of a small team of individuals who had to take the heat, cover each other's backs, and deliver for the business.

Is Your Company Ready For Big Data?

Nov 4, 2015 • HV Mfg Magazine

Let's start with two truths about data. The first is that data without context is meaningless. The second is that data has no value in and of itself; it's what a business does with the data that brings value to the table. Data is a strategic asset, but only if it's used constructively so that business results can be achieved.

This suggests that a business needs to accomplish a number of precursor activities to set the stage for any data analytics project's requirements. I submit that a company's website is a good place to start. All businesses have one, but how many have the tactical goal of collecting and analyzing information?

Your Master Production Schedule Is Only As Good As Your Production Plan

For manufacturing, the master production schedule (MPS) is the master of all downstream schedules. Those downstream schedules of work activities are driven/shaped as a result of the MPS that drives the material requirements planning process (MRP).

When a manufacturing operation is viewed as being out of control, initially blame is pointed to the MRP process. Given the number of variables involved with MRP processing, it's almost logical to point the finger there, but eventually the finger of blame will move uphill to the MPS. It will be described as unstable, inaccurate, not well managed. Yet, the MPS doesn't live in a vacuum. It's totally dependent upon the production plan (PP),

Writing Style and Formatting

You Are What People Read

- Use a consistent writing style and eliminate grammatical, spelling, and punctuation errors.
- Avoid ugly formatting: needs to be professional, clean, and attractive.
